Four passenger train excursions were operated from Shortsville to Phelps and return over the Finger Lakes Railway using two diesel locomotives and five passenger coaches. Each train ride lasted 90 minutes and was an 18 mile round trip.

LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD HISTORIC PHOTOGRAPHS

Attached are the LVRR photos. My great grandfather, Henry H. Kingston, was the General Traffic Manager for the Lehigh Valley Railroad in 1900. His private business car was LVRR # 354. These photos were taken by his son, H. H. Kingston Jr. Hank Kingston - Rochester, NY

BIOGRAPHY OF HENRY HOUSTON KINGSTON, SR. (1854-1931)

Henry Houston Kingston, Sr.

- 1854 - Henry Houston Kingston, Sr. was born on July 7th in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He was the son of Stephen Beasley Kingston, Jr. & Julia Elizabeth Kingston (Elliot). Henry was named for his father's good friend, Henry H. Houston, and his railroad co-worker. Henry grew up in the Germantown section of Philadelphia. Henry graduated from the Germantown Academy.
- 1870 - Henry began working at age 16 for the Pennsylvania Railroad, where both his father and grandfather had offices and held railroad positions during the Civil War.
- 1875 - Henry married Fannie Hunter on September 9th at St. Peter's Episcopal Church.
- 1879 - Recorded in the Philadelphia City Directory, Henry was listed as a clerk working for the Pennsylvania Railroad.
- 1883 - Henry left the Pennsylvania Railroad for a new offer as Traffic Manager with the Lehigh Valley Railroad. This position provided him with his own private rail car to travel in for the Lehigh Valley. He had offices in Philadelphia and New York City, and was promoted to the position of General Traffic Manager for the entire Lehigh Valley railroad system. Sometime during his Lehigh Valley employment, Henry was given a large cigar chest filled with cigars in recognition of his railroad work. The gift was a bit ironic, since he did not smoke at all.
- 1903 - Henry retired from the Lehigh Valley Railroad after a railroading career of 33 years. That same year, Henry Sr. lent his private rail car to his son, Henry Jr. and Jane Kingston for their honeymoon trip. After retiring from the railroad, Henry became an officer of the Guarantee Trust Bank of Philadelphia.
- 1931 - Henry Houston Kingston, Sr. died on April 2nd in Philadelphia three months short of his 77th birthday. He was buried in the Whitmarsh Cemetery adjacent to his wife Fannie's grave and next to his good friend, Henry Howard Houston.

Why Is This Man Smiling?
By Paul Worboys

Paul Worboys

At last, due diligence is winning the day!

This self-portrait of the writer in smile mode was snapped on the first of December, when all should have been cold and snowy, rather than mimicking the first spring kiss of April. He's smiling because of the beehive of activity that is transforming Rochester Junction into a semblance of the intriguing place it was decades ago, when the Lehigh Valley Railroad bisected Plains Road in the Town of Mendon.

Tooling through this beloved site in October, this fellow, being a genius of perception, exclaimed upon spotting a crater near the highway, "Hey, who dropped a bomb on Rochester Junction?!" A bit later, down the trail toward Mendon, he happened upon an abstraction jutting skyward and spewed quizzically, "For gosh sakes, since when did this place become a sculpture garden?!"

Rushing back to hobo jungle down by the mineral spring, a terse letter was to be scrawled to news editors, but it slipped his mind in a can o' beans. For you Millennials, Generation Next or Echo Boomers, beans were a staple to hobos, tramps and floaters, those poor souls ridin' the rails, stomachs forever growlin', in search of their future.

Freight House Work

Weeks transpired before I returned to the scene of my distress, now, of course, Mendon Foundation's Lehigh Valley Trail. As it turns out, the perceived bomb crater is blooming into a replica of the former freight house that was on the site.

By next year, this building, painted in Lehigh Valley livery, will offer toilet, meeting room and mini-museum amenities for trail users and fans. A combination of volunteer and contractor labor will do the trick.

As for the sculpture garden, that's what it is, but with a historical theme to pique the curiosity of railroad buffs and recreationists alike. In 1964, a tremendous railroad wreck resulted in numerous freight cars strewn about this very spot, in various forms of crumpleness.

Sculpture Garden

After LVRR maintenance-of-way crews cleared away the dozens of cars scattered akimbo, one notable artifact lay half-buried under the tailings. Forty years after the fact, a distorted steel boxcar door was found in the brush.

To commemorate that event (and a similar derailment at the same location in 1943), an Eagle Scout project turned that frumpy door into a reminder that Rochester Junction, which served about 700,000 trains, millions of people and untold millions of railroad cars, was a heavy duty, life and lore, gritty and growling, railroad place for three generations.

Now comes the best part, something the writer dreamt of ever since the Mendon Foundation gang began resurrecting the spirit of the old Lehigh Valley more than a decade ago. The predominant feature of Rochester Junction, especially as it now can serve trail users, is the way the branch line flared off toward Hemlock Lake, through Honeoye Falls, Lima and Livonia Center. With tracks laid out in a Y formation, trains, at least the locomotives pulling those trains, could do a sort of three-point turn, like we might do in our gas-guzzlers.

For several years, only the westerly leg of the Y [wye], including its little bridge over Surrine Creek, was adapted to trail use. The other leg, flaring toward the east, was buried in brambles, with its two little bridges (each spanning about 30 feet) topped with dangerously rotted wooden ties (sleepers). Fresh stone dust has been laid down and the bridges cleared for new decking. Soon, the entire wye will be a full-fledged part of the Lehigh Trail. Hoooo-ray!

South Approach to Wye

RSY A Bridge

The wye was a favorite place for adventuresome kids, who often walked the branch tracks from Honeoye Falls for a day's viewing of the LV's mainline of rolling thunder. For a railroad setting, either leg was bucolic, since, by the 1960s, passenger train service was gone and branch traffic usually amounted to five to ten short, slow freights per week. Mainline action, however, from New York to Buffalo via Mendon and Rush, Caledonia and Victor, still amounted to a couple dozen long trains per day.

The Clover Street overpass (Route 65), removed in 1977, after the Lehigh quit in 1976, muted the loud chime horn of onrushing locomotives from the east. Often, just before our arrival at the junction, we'd detect a muffled train whistle blowing for the Quaker Meetinghouse Road crossing.

Running as if pursued by a railroad cop, we'd race up one leg of the wye, just in time to catch sight of a speeding, thundering wall of freight cars and a kaleidoscope of light and shadow through the trees. As far as people can recollect, no one ever turned an ankle or got a mug full of cinders in scampering to glimpse those trains.

We never feared recrimination, either from getting smushed by a locomotive or collared by the law, for our days were days of freedom to roam and explore almost at will. Sure, vandals have existed since ancient times, but most fuzzy-faced scouting parties appreciated the elbow room and refrained from, as it were, "soiling the nest."

RSY 379 A Sign

There's still work to be done on the wye, especially the deck/railing installations that will provide safe passage over those bridges (formerly designated "RSY 379 A" and "RSY 379 B"). One of those signs, found buried under cinders by the writer, will grace the finished product, as trail users access the presently undeveloped Great Bend Park from either direction.

Swallowed in the swamp, the old hobo junction at the ruins of the former commercial mineral spring is gone forever. Otherwise, a reincarnation of this old-timer's youthful vision of the Rochester Junction railroad era is proceeding at "full steam ahead!"
